It includes course work in feminist theories, women and social movements, transnational feminisms, women of color feminisms, postcolonial feminism, women's economic conditions in the context of globalization and development, productions of women in the media and literature, queer studies, women's health and masculinity studies.

The Gender and Women's Studies Department teaches students to view the world with a critical analytical approach grounded in a social justice framework. The department adheres to a disciplinary practice that centers on an integrative, intersectional framing of issues concerning gender, race, class, sexuality, nationality, ethnicity, age and the differently abled.

History of Organization and Time of Existence:

A Program of study in Gender and Women's Studies first came into existence in 1977 at CSU, Northridge. We became a Department in 1993 and established a major in 2000. Gender and Women's Studies is an interdisciplinary program and is one of only two campuses in the CSU that offers a major in the field. The major and minor provide a background for various careers such as law, counseling and healthcare or advanced graduate degrees in fields such as Gender Studies, Women's Studies, education, communication, political, cultural and media studies.
